Running home after school to get on AIM to chat with my friends was one of my most vivid memories of middle school. I had exactly an hour and a half to do whatever I wanted online before I had to pretend that I was doing homework the whole time when my parents got home. I loved being able to custom-ize the bio page in AIM and would change up all the colors and fonts because I thought it looked pretty. But looking back at it, rainbow comic sans was pretty tacky.

I used to love playing dress up games online. They would immerse me in a world where I could pretend that I was a different person and had people to see, places to go (but of course I was like 12 so really what things did I have to do that were so important that I needed to dress up?) I liked to imagine myself in the wildest situations and pick crazy outfits for them.
